NO lithium warehouses in Vacaville!

As a concerned resident of Vacaville, I strongly oppose the proposed construction of lithium battery warehouses within our community. Vacaville is a unique and cherished city, rooted in agriculture, open farmland, and family-centered living. Allowing a hazardous industrial project such as a lithium battery facility to take root here is entirely inappropriate and inconsistent with the character, safety, and values of our community. Lithium battery storage and distribution sites pose serious environmental and public safety risks â€” including chemical fires, toxic runoff, and potential air quality issues. These hazards are not hypothetical; lithium battery fires are notoriously difficult to contain and can release harmful gases, threatening the health of residents, first responders, and the surrounding farmland.

Vacaville is not an industrial hub â€” it is a family-oriented community surrounded by working farms, schools, and homes. Bringing this type of high-risk operation here would endanger the rural charm and wholesome lifestyle that generations of residents have worked hard to preserve. Our community is built on trust, nature, and safety â€” not on industrial profit at the expense of our well-being.

There are very few communities left in California as genuine and grounded as Vacaville. We take pride in being a safe, peaceful place to raise our children, support local agriculture, and enjoy open spaces. Introducing a hazardous lithium battery facility undermines everything that makes Vacaville special.

We urge our city officials, planning commission, and local representatives to protect our community by rejecting any proposals for lithium battery warehouses or industrial storage sites within or near residential and agricultural zones. Vacavilleâ€™s identity, safety, and environmental integrity must come before corporate interests.

Letâ€™s preserve the Vacaville we know and love â€” a place for families and farms, not hazardous industry.

Please find another community for this project.
