No New Power Plant in Redondo Beach

Why are we still arguing this issue? Why is that eyesore still standing? It can be demonstrated that it's paltry output isn't needed, isn't directed toward our area but sent to "the grid", and In 2002 AES itself supported rezoning the land for condo construction. A new, un-needed plant, running all the time, will generate even more pollution for the South Bay (AES admitted in May, 2012, that they planned to submit for a permit to run at 76% annual capacity and stated they intend to run the plant between 25% and 42% of annual capacity). We are losing potential city revenue by letting it remain, it depresses property value and business development in neighboring areas. I know, I know, you've heard all this, you probably generated some of the reports cited, There is a lot of fear-mongering, legal posturing and outright falsehood coming from AES and the folks paid to speak or shill for them but it will all evaporate in the face of clear leadership from the CPUC.
