Subject: Controlling thermostats in our homes

I find the idea that the state will decide what temperature our house is to be at to be an infringement of our civil rights. In fact knowing what our temperature set point is at in our home is also none of the state's business.

This is overboard and the law will be resisted and resented by the populace.

Perhaps if the state is trying to save energy in peak demand times, it should consider offering bonuses for consumers that use less electricity during those times.

A carrot is much better than a leash.
